Tissue microarrays (TMAs) have become a very powerful research tool for testing hypotheses in human clinical and experimental systems. The approach provides the ability to obtain multiple tissue samples from a small tissue specimen using a robotic instrument. The benefits of the approach include the ability to obtain multiple tissue samples from a small area of diseased or "normal" tissue, multiple tissue samples from a single patient, and comparisons of patient samples with a large number of "control" tissue samples. Data can be obtained from multiple cell types within an organ or tissue. TMAs have been used in a variety of applications, such as clinical diagnostics, risk assessment, basic research into biology and disease, and drug development. (1,2) TMA technology was developed by researchers at the University of Basel (UNIBAS) and has been commercialized by Aperio Technologies, Inc. (Aperio). TMA construction begins with a "donor block" of formalin-fixed, paraffin-embedded tissue (FFPET). The donor block contains many small tissue samples on a "donor block" slide. Five or six tissues are spaced
